

Help!

Taking water from our agricultural regions hurts all of California. Agricultural revenue is a steady economic factor for California as people need food in both up and down economic cycles. The past decade has shown us that we must have solid, stabilizing economic factors to offset the more erratic boom and bust business models such as high tech and housing growth that we love in California. Please, I urge you to act with great restraint when making decisions that might inhibit California's great agricultural business.
